Opening the Black Box offers detailed guidance on how to assess each driver. It also applies the framework at two levels. At the country level, the report looks at 'archetypes' of challenging country contexts, such as regimes with no formal space or full support for citizen-engagement and fragile and conflict-affected situations.

In science studies, the social process of blackboxing is based on the abstract notion of a black box. To cite Bruno Latour, blackboxing is a way scientific and technical work is made invisible by its own success. When a machine runs efficiently, when a matter of fact is settled, we need focus only on its inputs and outputs and not on its internal complexity.
